Unleashing the potential of learning professionals

The Problem Is!

- Those new to training need confidence.
- Learning and Development professionals seek practical career development qualifications
- New or aspiring Learning & Development managers need specialist support in managing the function
- Expectations of L&D managers are rising as they assume greater responsibility for organisational learning
- Self employed learning and training professionals have no-where to go to develop their skills in a cost effective way
- Learning professionals need to enhance their credibility within the organisation

Which Results In!

- The investment in learning activity including training and development being wasted
- Training is reactive and does not achieve the maximum return on the investment in time and money
- Decision making capability is restricted through lack of specialist input
- Learning specialists contributions becomes stale and disengaged
- Little career development for learning and training professionals
- Organisations do not develop the skills and behaviours they need
